FLASHING BACK TO THE PAST:

October - Matriarch to LGBT Community Dies
Ruth Ellis was 101 when she died on Oct. 5. Born July 23, 1899, in Springfield, Illinois, Ellis was respected and loved for her longevity and endurance as one of Detroit’s oldest and proudest African-American lesbians, the first woman in the City of Detroit to own her own printing company, and for her many years of service to all people in need. Beginning in the 1930s, Ellis provided shelter, physical support and spiritual affirmation to those whose race, sexual orientation or both set them apart from the dominant culture. Ruth Ellis Center is named in honor of her life and work.

August - Car Show Offers Gay Camaraderie
Gay car enthusiasts came together for the four-day Lambda Car Club Grand International, which attracted more than 350 people from across the nation and Europe to the Troy Holiday Inn. Close to 160 cars filled the parking lot during the event sponsored by Ford (GLOBE), General Motors (GM PLUS) and DaimlerChrysler (POD).

April - Royal Oak Ban on Serving Gays Repealed
The city commissioners in Royal Oak unanimously repealed a 41-year-old ordinance that banned the serving to “homosexuals, prostitutes and drug users” at liquor establishments on April 6. The long-forgotten ordinance had reportedly not been enforced in years, if at all. The original language of the ordinance had been lifted directly from a state statute that was revised. The antiquated ordinance came to light in a meeting with management of the Royal Oak Music Theater.

June - Benefits for Gays
Kalamazoo became the second city in the state of Michigan (Ann Arbor was the first) to allow same-sex partners of city employees to participate in all benefits extended to their married heterosexual peers. Kalamazoo City Manager Pat DiGiovanni said at the time the new policy makes “good sense from the point of attracting and retaining good employees.”

DR. LAURA’S ROCKY YEAR

Dr. Laura Schlessinger, a conservative radio and television talk show host, had provoked the ire of gay groups for calling homosexuality “deviant” and derivative of “biological error.”

- January - As the protests and demonstrations against Paramount continued, and meetings between the studio and the Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation yielded no results, the stage is set for a massive revolt against Dr. Laura Schlessinger.
- March - Designed to build “a coalition against hate,” StopDrLaura.com was launched, attracting 373,345 hits in its first 24 hours. The Horizons Foundation in San Francisco ran full-page ads against the radio talk show host, calling her message “harmful to our children.” The ads ran in the national editions of the New York Times, San Francisco Chronicle, San Francisco Examiner and the Los Angeles Times.
- April - Dr. Laura canceled appearances and book signings across the country in the wake of massive protests, claiming she didn’t want to “compromise anyone’s physical safety.”
- May - Dr. Laura strikes back, going on Larry King Live and Fox News Sunday to defend her beliefs and statements. Contradicting herself, she tells King she’s “not the expert” on sexual orientation, while on Fox News she stands by her infamous “biological error” quote claiming her Ph.D. in biology backs it up. By the end of the month Dr. Laura had reduced her interview schedule and allegedly devised a method of ending them early if necessary.
- June - Paramount withdrew Dr. Laura and her upcoming TV show from a scheduled panel with TV critics at the annual press tour scheduled for July in Pasadena, Calif.
- July - Dr. Laura posted a “Call to Action” on her website, urging fans to help save her advertisers.
- August - Tapings for the first Dr. Laura show begins and, according to sources, Dr. Laura continues her crusade against gays and lesbians reiterating her belief that they are a “biological error.”
- September - As Dr. Laura debuted on TV, demonstrations took place in over 30 cities airing the weekday program. “The protests are going to last until the TV show comes off the air and Paramount drops its double standard on prejudice,” said John Aravosis, co-founder of StopDrLaura.com.
- October - Two Canadian TV stations became the first to dump Dr. Laura. In a letter that was to run on the back cover of today’s edition of Variety, the Hollywood trade paper, Dr. Laura said, “In talking about gays and lesbians, some of my words were poorly chosen. I deeply regret the hurt this situation has caused the gay and lesbian community.” Dr. Laura, who is an Orthodox Jew, said in the letter that she was seeking forgiveness in keeping with the tradition of Yom Kippur, the Jewish Day of Atonement.
- November - Across the country, Dr. Laura found her TV show dropped to late-night time slots from 2-6 a.m. in seven of the country’s top 10 TV markets.
- December - With stations across the country continuing to downgrade and drop the show, a Variety article estimated that Paramount had lost $1 million on Dr. Laura.
Q&A: Meet Creating Change Co-Chair Bridie Johnson

BY JASON A. MICHAEL

Creating Change is an annual LGBTQ conference put on by the National LGBTQ Task Force. Hosting hundreds of workshops, caucus sessions, keynote speakers and more, the more than 30-year-old event tours across the U.S., every year choosing a city in which to showcase the LGBTQ community’s local and national community. This year, Creating Change 2019 is coming to Detroit in January. In advance of the event, BTL has reached out to interview four local co-chairs who are involved in putting on this Detroit-specific event. This interview is part of that series.

Bridie Johnson is a state-licensed social worker and is currently employed as the clinical supervisor of the Behavioral Health Department of American Indian Health and Family Services. Prior to that, Johnson was the director of programs for the Ruth Ellis Center. Johnson has also conducted national trainings on transgender inclusion in the Domestic Violence Sexual Assault Shelter safe space movement in Michigan. In addition, Johnson conducted research for the I Am for Survivors Project, an initiative focused on increasing accessibility in Michigan for LGBT survivors of domestic and sexual violence needing safe shelter spaces.

What does Creating Change mean to you?
Creating Change is a national change agent that assures those of the majority are awakened and opened up to learn and grow with people in desperate need for acceptance and inclusion. For some, Creating Change is a place to mingle, network and relax; for others, Creating Change is a life-saving mechanism that holds the individual together due to lack of community support in their lives.

What are you doing to create change in your own life?
I live by Creating Change’s philosophy. I model appropriate inclusive behavior and am an ally to many in the LGBT community and my personal networks represent those I support always.

What made you feel you had to be a co-chair?
The fact that I was nominated by friends and colleagues in the Metro Detroit area immediately created a sense of honor and devotion to assure the event goes smoothly for its 31st year here in Detroit. This along with my internal desire to consistently creating change in my life and in Detroit are both extremely important to me.

What are you most looking forward to about Creating Change 2019?
Presenting an educational workshop for the community at large. Along with seeing and networking with 4,000-plus individuals and spending a week here in the heart of the city of Detroit together with over 350 breakout sessions to learn from making it the largest LGBT training in the nation.

What is your take on Gay Rights in the Era of No. 45? Where are we as a community and where do we need to be?
My take on No. 45 is better left unspoken, and as a community we all as allies need to be in Detroit, in January, for Creating Change 2019. In Detroit our community should remember that we are here to resist, relearn and then return to our community stronger than we were before.

More information about the conference and its offerings can be found online at creatingchange.org. Watch for our interviews with all the Creating Change 2019 co-chairs in upcoming issues of BTL.
The Morning After: No Pill, Just Hard Work

BY MICHELLE E. BROWN

One of the lasting lessons I learned from Detroit’s legendary activist Jeff Montgomery was no matter what the outcome was of an election, we must prepare for the morning after. As I write this before knowing the results, I know that things could go either for or against us, but we have to be prepared. When he said this advice, Montgomery was talking about the 2004 Michigan vote that made it unconstitutional for the state to recognize or perform same-sex marriages or civil unions. So much was at stake.

The 2018 midterm elections are much the same. So much is at stake, not just for the LGBTQIA community, but for immigrants, education, fair wages, survivors of sexual assault, reproductive rights, voting rights and so much more.

And, no matter what the outcome of the midterm election, we still have a lot of work to do. There are no quick fixes. There’s no morning-after pill to fix all that’s wrong in our communities, our state, our country and in our world.

And as much as I want to believe that rainbow and blue waves can turn the tide on the bright orange tsunami that’s hell-bent on destroying all we hold dear, the reality is things didn’t just get bad since 45 took office; they just got real. Really real.

Racism, homophobia and transphobia have only been emboldened under 45 but were nothing new for communities of color or members of the LGBTQIA community. We knew we weren’t entering a post-racial period in America with the election of Barack Obama. There was still Trayvon Martin, Tamir Rice, Tanisha Anderson, Walter Scott, Sandra Bland, Mike Brown, Eric Garner and others.

Black Lives Matter but everyday reports of shootings and social and economic disparities said they didn’t. At the same time, rhetoric against other communities of color and immigrants was ratcheted up in daily tweets.

And even with the end of “don’t ask, don’t tell,” marriage equality and markedly increased support for LGBTQIA rights across the country and in the White House, the gay community knew there would still be haters.

Despite Trump’s promise to defend LGBTQ rights, his health agency has blocked efforts to combat discrimination. Political appointees have haled or rolled back regulations intended to protect LGBTQ workers and patients, removed LGBTQ-friendly language from documents and reassigned the Democracy is a living, participative work in progress that takes all of our effort not only at the polls but every day. There will be wounds to heal and fences to mend, but let's commit to do the work. Let's get beyond partisan politics and fight for a system that puts people first. Let's re-commit to the promise of America that has historically brought immigrants to this country, celebrate their contributions and not let our borders be ruled by fear and hate-mongering.

Let's provide our children a safe space to learn, where they’ll learn to think critically, feel safe and recognize they can differ with someone without vilifying them. But most importantly, let them know that they should be respected and free to be their authentic selves, especially if they are LGBTQIQ.

Let's not forget the environment, income inequality, jobs with fair wages, healthcare and so much more just in this country. But we're also part of the global community. There's only one earth and our actions/inactions have global implications.

There's no morning-after pill to fix all that's wrong in our communities, our state, our country and in our world, but maybe now that we've seen just how ugly things can get, we're ready to get it done!

Keep MA Safe

By Dianne Witkowski

Now, I don't need to tell you that minority rights should never be on the ballot. It was wrong to let the majority vote on marriage rights for same-sex couples, for example. It is incredibly damaging to have the voting majority debating whether or not your family is legitimate or if the love you feel for your partner is "real" or if you're just a weirdo pervert.

Stick figure without a skirt on the other side standing on a toilet peeking over the divide. Their TV spot is even worse, depicting a man lurking in a bathroom stall and peering out at a young women getting dressed while a voiceover warns that "convicted sex offenders" would basically be commandeering all toilets from here on out.

Anyway, the message is clear: the "Bathroom and Locker Room Law" as KMAS calls it, will allow creeps to prey on women in these public spaces and there's nothing anyone can do about it. As if laws against sexual assault and harassment weren't already on the books.

Most egregious is an image on their website of a frightened girl looking out from a stall door. A beefy hand is planted next to her head, clearly indicating she's cornered and about to be assaulted. This is, plainly, sick. Because sexual assault against children is something that actually happens and the people who are demonizing trans folks are actually putting children in more danger by diverting resources and attention from actual threats.

It's never been easy to be trans, but today's climate is particularly awful. For one thing, under President Obama protections for trans people were written into law. Many trans people came out once they had the law on their side. But now the president himself demonizes trans folks and those who find the whole "transgender thing" confusing oricky or wrong are steadily chipping away at those protections. And yet trans folks who are out can't exactly go back into hiding. They are left exposed and targeted from the very top of the government on down.

Thankfully voting yes on the ballot question, which would leave the trans rights laws in place, has wide support in Massachusetts and it's likely to win. And I hope that by the time you're reading this it has. And that we have many other wins to celebrate before taking a quick break so that we're refreshed and energized for 2020. Because fascism isn't going to fight itself.
A crowd of nearly 100 came out Saturday to Wayne State University’s Gullen Mall for a rally called You Can’t Erase Permanent. Organized by a variety of groups, including TG Detroit, Ferndale Pride, the Metro-Detroit Political Action Network, Stand with Trans, Transcend the Binary, the Gender-Identity Network Alliance, FM Detroit, Transgender Michigan and Affirmations, the rally was emceed by Samantha Rogers from TG Detroit and Ferndale Pride Event Chair Julia Music.

The rally was held in response to a leaked memo from within the Trump administration that demonstrated its attempt to change the legal definition of gender.

“They plan to define transgender people right out of existence,” Rogers said. “Here’s what they said: ‘Sex means a person’s status as male or female based on immutable biological traits identified by or before birth.’ They said, ‘Key government agencies need to adopt an explicit and uniform definition of gender as determined on a biological basis that is clear and grounded in science.’ I don’t know what science they’ve been looking at, but the science I’ve been seeing kicks their science’s ass.”

Rogers, like most of those who spoke at the rally, spoke passionately about voting in Tuesday’s midterm elections.

“We exist and we always have exited, but so has hatred, so has blind prejudice,” Rogers said. “Leaders without morals pray on weak minds and ferment groundless fear.”

Speaking directly to the president, Rogers was clear.

“We are Americans, Mr. Trump. We’ve been here forever and we’re not going away. We deserve better than you, Mr. Trump, because we actually love this country that you and your greed seek to destroy,” Rogers said. “We deserve better. But we are not leaving. You can count on it. You cannot legislate us away. We exist. We exist whether you like it or not and this is our country, too.”

Tammi Moyer, the western Wayne County chapter leader for Transgender Michigan, shared a similar message.

“We are humans and we deserve every right and protection that every citizen of this great country has,” Moyer said. “If our government can’t see this, then come this Tuesday, please go to the polls and tell them just that. Exercise your voice. Vote and tell them if they can’t see that we are people that deserve every right and legal protection that everybody else has then they are not qualified to represent us.”

Roz Keith, executive director of Stand with Trans, also made an impassioned plea.

“We need to make change,” Keith said. “We need to vote for people who believe in your transgender rights, the rights of our families and children and neighbors. We need to rally together as a community. Together we are stronger and mightier. We are all so much more than our gender.”

Other speakers at the rally included Jack Elliot Earls from Transcend the Binary, Jo Jess Fournier of the Metro-Detroit Political Action Network, Green Party gubernatorial candidate Jennifer Kurland, Robert Jay from MDPAN, transgender icon and founder of the now defunct Crossroads Grace Bacon, Ashton Niedzwiecki from Detroit FtM, Emme Zanotti from Stand with Trans and more.

Several community activists were unable to attend the rally but sent statements. Organizers read remarks from Rachel Crandall-Crocker, executive director of Transgender Michigan; Green Party candidate for lieutenant governor Char Davenport; former gubernatorial candidate Abdul El Sayed; Michelle Fox-Phillips, executive director of the Gender-Identity Network Alliance; ACLU of Michigan LGBT Project Staff Attorney Jay Kaplan; Brayden Misiolek from Transcend the Binary; Dana Nessel, Democratic candidate for attorney general; Liliana Reyes, interim executive director of Afirmations and Stephanie White, executive director of Equality Michigan.

A friend reached out to me yesterday to see if I was OK. She said, “Everyone I care about is under attack.” My dear friend was referring to the administration’s desire to “erase” trans identities and the slaughter of 11 Jews one week ago today in Pittsburgh. My sorrow, remorse and anger was twofold. I’m a Jewish mother of a transgender child and many transgender friends.

Earlier this week, a 14-year-old trans boy sent me a text. He and I have been in contact now for about a month. He is desperate for his mom’s support, and I’ve been trying to help him bridge the gap with her. The text was to update me as I’ve sent him a few resources to share with his mom in the hope that she would come around and accept his authentic identity.

She told him that she has no interest in reading anything or talking to anyone who takes his side. She told him that nothing will change for her. She doesn’t “believe” in it. The “it” being transgender identities.

As a parent, my goal has always been to support my children; to love them unconditionally; to parent with guidance, boundaries and love; and to show them that there are all sorts of people in the world.

It is my job to reinforce that they may not be friends with everyone and not everyone will like them or want to be their friend, but that they need to be kind.

When my son came out to me as transgender nearly six years ago, I had no idea what to do. I didn’t have any transgender friends or a community I could turn to. However, I did know that I loved my child with every fiber of my being. I knew that I would do whatever it took to get the support he needed; to find the resources necessary so he could have a future.

I can’t pretend it was easy. There were a lot of bumps and bruises along the way, deep potholes that tripped us up numerous times, but we kept going. This is parenting. No one ever said it would be easy.

Also, I cannot have attended Wayne State University’s transgender protest of Trump-initiated hatred without mentioning that 11 of my Jewish community members were also gunned down recently for no reason in the sanctuary where they came for peace. They were there to pray to God, to thank God for another week: fathers, brothers, sons, grandmothers, friends, husbands and wives were gunned down for no reason other than the fact that they were Jewish.

I am a cisgender, heterosexual white Jewish woman who raised a family to be kind and fair and to value others. I will never know what it’s like to walk in the shoes of a transgender person, to be dismissed because of who I am. However, I do know what it’s like to be hated just because I pray to a different God. We need to make change. We need to vote for people who believe in your transgender rights, the rights of our families and children and neighbors.

We need to rally together as a community. Together we are stronger and mightier. We are all so much more than our gender. Let’s show the world how amazing we truly are. Shalom. Peace.

Michigan Outscores National Average in HRC Municipal Equality Index

BY EVE KUCHARSKI

ast month the Human Rights Campaign recognized Michigan as high above the national average in its annual Municipal Equality Index.
The state earned 73 out of 100 possible points — 15 points higher than the national average of 58. HRC is a national LGBTQ activism organization and releases its Index in an effort to provide a comprehensive breakdown of the LGBTQ-inclusiveness of laws, policies, benefits and services across 506 U.S. cities.
These cities are chosen in an effort to fairly represent some of the largest communities of LGBTQ people across the nation.

Xavier Persad is HRC’s Senior Legislative Counsel and the author of this year’s MEI Report. He broke down why Michigan’s cities were selected for rating.

“Fifty state capitals, the 200 largest cities in the country, the five largest cities in each state, 75 cities with high proportions of same-sex couples according to a Williams Institute analysis of the 2010 U.S. Census, the cities that are home to each state’s two largest public universities and 98 cities selected by members and supporters of our state LGBTQ equality group partners,” Persad said. “So, significant overlap between those criteria results in the cities that we rate for a total of 11 in Michigan.”

The MEI counts points for each chosen city via a five-part scorecard that covers these categories: Non-Discrimination Laws, Municipality as Employer, Municipal Services, Law Enforcement and Leadership on LGBTQ Equality. Due to the varying size and population of each selected city, what constitutes a perfect 100-point score for one municipality might be significantly different for another. Persad said that this is wholly intentional.

“Our scorecard is structured in a way to allow any city of any size with varying levels of legal authority to score well, even 100 points despite those varying levels of resources and legal authority,” he said.
“We have 100 points on the scorecard as well as 22 bonus points that reflect things that many cities can do that perhaps all cities cannot do. Or ways that cities are going above and beyond in pushing equality more and what that looks like. So, yes, cities of any size, political background and resources can achieve 100 points.”

So, although Michigan does not have existing statewide civil rights laws that cover gender identity or sexual orientation, it hasn’t deterred four of its cities — Ann Arbor, Detroit, East Lansing and first-timer Ferndale — from becoming what the MEI ranks as all-stars.

“What we mean by that is that these cities scored extremely well above an 85 despite being located in a state like Michigan where there’s no state-level non-discrimination protections for LGBTQ people,” Persad said. “Generally, cities that we rated in Michigan averaged above the national average because of local leadership and in passing comprehensive non-discrimination protections for LGBTQ people that reach housing, employment and public accommodations.”

And according to the aggregated scores in the 2018 MEI, this year in general has been a good one for the Great Lakes region. Overall, the area’s regional average score was reported to have increased by one point, as well as other positive shifts.

“One point increase is nothing, but when we look at the number of cities that have zero points, it means that they are simply the right thing to do.”

For example, Warren scored the worst at only 14 points because it earned only partial minority credit in the category of Non-Discrimination and half credit in the category of Law Enforcement.
The second-worst scorer was Sterling Heights at 20 points. It earned partial minority credit in Non-Discrimination, half credit in Law Enforcement and partial majority credit in the Relationship with LGBTQ Community category. The third-worst city was Pleasant Ridge at 55 points.
While the city did earn full credit in its Non-Discrimination category, it only earned half credit in Law Enforcement, partial minority credit in the Municipality as Employer category and partial majority credit in its Relationship with the LGBTQ community. Each of the three worst-scoring cities had no bonus points.

But though those cities were below average, Persad emphasized that “this is not a measure of the best places to live for LGBTQ people or lived experience,” stating that the MEI is a tool that can be used for city officials to understand what work needs to be done and for citizens to understand their protections in certain areas. Persad said that a high score can also serve as an indirect benefit local industry, too.

“From the work that we’ve done with our sister index, the Corporate Equality Index, we know that businesses value diversity and inclusion and value enforceable protections that include the LGBTQ community,” he said. “So, more and more, we’re finding that business leaders are using the Municipal Equality Index as a tool as they consider opening sites or expanding or relocating.”

But even beyond the potential fiscal benefit, Persad put it plainly: “Enacting LGBTQ-inclusive protections is just simply the right thing to do.”

He added that for those places that would like to improve their given scores, Detroit Barbershop Helps Patrons Express The Bearded Lady Within

BY DREW HOWARD

ne look at The Bearded Lady's waiting room – a bright, cheery space complete with a beer fridge, coffee maker, bookshelf, standing lamp and a backdrop of family photos – and visitors might think they missed the barbershop and stumbled across someone’s living room. Ash Hipp's is the shop’s owner. She said that's exactly how customers are supposed to feel because comfort for all is the shop's priority.

“I just wanted to have a place where everybody felt welcome, where no one felt weird,” she said. “Because I’ve both worked in salons and attended them, I know it could be very uncomfortable for people. I could get that read on people.”

And the shop certainly draws a collection of diverse clientele. Something in which shop employee Vanu Gant takes a lot of pride. Unlike a more traditional salon, Gant said she sees about an equal amount of women as she does men.

“We have all types of these blue-collar dudes, and they could be sitting next to someone who (has) got lime green hair, 10 piercings and a mullet,” Gant said. “And we would all get into conversation.”

In fact, the opportunity to service a community with a diverse clientele is what drew Hipp to the Detroit area. Before opening The Bearded Lady, she worked to cultivate a community with a diverse clientele is what drew Hipp to the Detroit area. Before opening The Bearded Lady, she worked to cultivate a strong network of customers through a variety of odd jobs in the area.

Many of these were pop-up events, she said, which involved Hipp setting up her own haircut station at venues like farmers markets, block parties and various Detroit businesses.

“If there was an opportunity to take, I took it, no matter how weird it was,” she said.

Hipp’s setup was not unlike a rock band traveling with stage equipment from one gig to the next, but instead of guitars and amps she unpacked a minisalon.

“I'd lug around a whole station,” she said. “I was loading it and unloading it, not having running water and having to cut hair in terrible lighting and borrowing lamps. It was fun, and I'm glad I did it. ... it helped build my confidence.”

“Warm,” “laid-back” and “friendly” are the words she uses to describe the Detroiter who she met while travelling with her haircutting station around the Metro area. Those are also the adjectives she hopes that current customers will use when describing The Bearded Lady today.

Perhaps some of the reason that much of Hipp's focus is on a welcoming salon is because it was her family's business, too. Much of her childhood was spent helping her grandmother and aunt's salon in Flint.

“They always had me in there ripping foils, sweeping, folding towels,” she said. “It was a just a part of our family. Someone was always getting their hair done – it was a family activity. ... My aunt would be doing my mom's hair, my hair, my brother's hair and my uncle's hair all at the same time.”

Hipp said that bringing a similar familial, laid-back energy to The Bearded Lady goes against the grain of many of the salons outside the Detroit area. And Hipp does include many personal touches in the way she runs her shop. For instance, it's not uncommon to see Hipp's social media posts of her dog Bernie – aka the shop’s unofficial canine mascot – hanging out with her at work. Observant customers will also notice a possibly abnormal amount of memorabilia from Hipp's all-time favorite TV show, "The Golden Girls," strewn about the shop.

“I have loved ‘Golden Girls’ since I was little,” Hipp said. “My mom always made fun of me, saying, ‘Why do you like that show about old ladies?’ I don't know. ... It's always been comforting to me.”

“Bea Arthur always reminds of my grandma,” she added. “The savviness, the personal style, the hair – everything about her reminds me of Bea Arthur.”

Quirky decor aside, Hipp's shop stands out in another way, too: pricing. She said that it's her belief that the cost of a haircut should be measured by length, not gender.

“I wanted to make sure I opened a place where people who could afford to get a haircut regularly could get them more frequently,” she said. “And for the people who have a problem affording a decent haircut, placing them at a price they could access.”

Accessibility goes beyond just pricing, though. As a member of the LGBTQ community, Hipp understands firsthand how tricky it can be for someone to request a haircut that falls outside societal gender norms.

“Every time I lived out of state or just couldn't get home and I needed a haircut, I went to other salons,” she said. “It would end up paying 60, 70 bucks for a haircut with these weird flourishes I didn't ask for. It's not reflective of my style, or how I prefer to look. They weren't paying attention, and just wanted to make sure I looked like a girl.”

That's why Hipp is adamant that she'll stick to the styles that customers request.

“If someone comes in and say they want a short haircut, or understands they want a classic fade or something, I'm not going to shy them away because I think it's more feminine to do something else,” she said.

That fearless approach to unconventional style – especially where it concerns gender presentation – is where the shop gets its offbeat name, too.

“It's a play on gender and gender roles,” Hipp said. “If you're a little strange, you can come here. There's a little bearded lady in everyone.”

The Bearded Lady is located at 1701 Trumbull Ave. in Detroit, Suite A on the corner of Trumbull and Bagley, on the Bagley side. Rev. Dr. Justin Tanis is known by many in the LGBTQ community for his book that explores the relationship of the transgender community to religion: “Transgender: Theology, Ministry and Communities of Faith.” The 2003 work has helped give Tanis, who is not only transgender himself but also the managing director for the Center for LGBTQ and Gender Studies at the Pacific School of Religion, a unique outlook on the topic. On Saturday, Nov. 10, he’ll be sharing his insights with Michigan crowds through a workshop at Ferndale’s Affirmations LGBTQ community center called Transgender and Thriving. The event is sponsored by the Metropolitan Community Church – Detroit in Clawson.

“It was my doctoral dissertation,” Tanis said of his written work. “I wrote the book that I wanted to read while I was transitioning, documenting God’s affirmation for transgender people. I wanted to highlight the primarily positive ways in which the Bible talks about gender differences and also begin to articulate what is different about theology done by and for transgender people.”

In 2003, Tanis’s book was one of very few on the shelves that attempted to tackle the crossroads of transgender persons and religion. “There was very little written by and for transgender people of faith at the time and I wanted to address that,” said Tanis. “I am particularly interested in providing a positive perspective for transgender people and our loved ones.”

So Tanis turned his dissertation into a textbook of sorts, teaching about the spiritual needs of the transgender community and the steps a church must take in include them.

Despite the 15 years that have passed since the book was written, Tanis said that the core of his work still stands up. He said he is glad that during that time there has been much improvement in both the understanding and perception of transgender people — though he said there is still much to be done.

“Many, many things have changed since I wrote the book,” he said. “To begin with, there is so much more research about transgender lives, so we have more concrete knowledge to back up what we knew anecdotally back then. We have also made considerable strides in greater social acceptance and legal protections, although those are under threat at the moment.

“Our language about transgender people has changed,” Tanis continued. “For example, my original editors felt ‘transgendered people’ was more grammatically correct than ‘transgender people.’ Now, people consider ‘transgendered’ to be a negative word. Back then, non-binary wasn’t used to the same degree that it is now. People used ‘gender variant.’”

In fact, considering the strides made over the past decade and a half, Tanis said he briefly considered re-writing the book.

“I decided not to re-write the book because so many of these things have changed,” he said. “I felt it was more important to let history stand as history and focus instead on writing new chapters and books. But I think that, terminology aside, there is much of the theology in this book that is very current and relevant.”

Today, with trans rights under attack, Tanis said it is more important than ever that communities of faith stand with the transgender community.

“I believe that communities of faith are called to model God’s love and care for people,” he said. “That includes standing with the marginalized who are often treated with disrespect, violence and discrimination in society. Young transgender women of color face horrific levels of violence and intolerance, and all members of the transgender community are greatly increased risk. This should not be acceptable to people of faith. We are called to treat others as we want to be treated by them and to treat our neighbors as ourselves.”

It’s also not lost on Tanis that it’s often so-called faith leaders who are perpetuating the violence against trans folks.

“People of faith are among the leaders trying to ensure that we do not have legal protections,” he said. “Christians are the ones fighting hate crimes legislation, non-discrimination ordinances, and promoting legal discrimination based on religion. Therefore, Christians and other people of faith need to be prominent in saying that those who promote intolerance do not speak for all of Christianity or all faiths. We have a responsibility to speak out when faith is being used as a weapon against others.”

Tanis went on to say that in trying political times, the transgender community and its allies can use the help of organized faith more than ever.

“Together, we’ll define spiritual health for ourselves and look at some of the components that contribute to our wellbeing,” Tanis said. “Then we’ll consider what these mean for us individually and how we might cultivate spiritual health within our communities. We’ll ask, ‘What can we do to preserve the lives of transgender people and how will that make a difference in our world? Our survival and our thriving are acts of resistance and resilience.”

Transgender & Thriving with Rev. Dr. Justin Tanis will place Saturday, Nov. 10 from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. at Affirmations in Ferndale. The church is located at 205 N. Main Street in Clawson. Admission to the workshop is $50 and includes a copy of Tanis’s book. For more information, visit mccdetroit.org.
No Tiptoeing with ‘Well-Intentioned White People’

Matrix Theater Season Opener Explores When Good Intentions Have Unintended Results

BY JENN MCKEE

Regulars at the Matrix Theatre might not be surprised to learn that Rachel Lynett’s darkly comic play, “Well-Intentioned White People,” initially caught the attention of Matrix Theatre’s artistic director, Megan Buckley-Ball, by way of its in-your-face title.

“We found it on the New Play Exchange,” said Buckley-Ball, referring to an online service provided by the National New Play Network. “Since Matrix has a specific mission to foster social justice, the Exchange has been a fantastic resource for us to find work by playwrights who are responding to what’s happening right now within their communities. … (Lynett’s play’s) title was incredibly intriguing to me, and the people who are calling for tickets seem to agree.”

“Well-Intentioned White People” focuses on a black lesbian professor, Cass, who one day finds the N-word keyed onto her car. Cass simply wants to get her car fixed and put the ugly incident behind her, but several white, well-intentioned allies – her roommate/ex-girlfriend; a dean; a student activist; and a transgender colleague – push her to talk about it publicly, and instead use the incident as a political rallying cry.

“Rachel Lynett obviously does not shy away from being blunt and keeping it real,” said Buckley-Ball. “There is a true victim in this show, and we get to see how people of color, and members of LGBTQ-plus communities, have to normalize the attacks they go through every single day just to get through each day. As far as this show is concerned, there’s no room for tiptoeing. These are real things that are happening. … The characters’ emotions are raw and real, and they speak their truth.”

Buckley-Ball added that the play is “very new property” as it just had its world premiere in Massachusetts only a few months ago. Because of that, there’s been a possibility for collaboration with Lynett directly.

“We’ve been in contact quite a bit,” said Buckley-Ball. “She’s done some script updates for us, which has been great, and she’s helped talk us through what’s going on in specific scenes and specific lines.”

Script adjustments involved, in part, making a transmasculine AFAB (assigned-female-at-birth) character into a transfeminine AMAB one, since Matrix’s production team had been struggling with casting the role.

“We cast Julia Lynn Marsh, who’s a transgender performer, but in the other direction – male-to-female,” said Buckley-Ball. “Rachel was fantastic and talked us through the process of our casting difficulties, and optimized the script for this change, so there would be nothing awkward.”

Of course, neither Lynett’s play nor Matrix’s production team aim to discourage white allies from taking action. Instead, they hope to encourage conversation about the best means of working toward positive change.

“For Dean West and for Viv, Cass’ ex-girlfriend, it’s a sense of empathy that propels them to do something,” said Buckley-Ball. “But what they don’t recognize is that what they’re doing is making it worse. Yes, they’re calling more attention to the issue, but while they’re doing that, Cass is receiving heightened racial threats on a daily basis – which she keeps from them. … We see this all the time. A race crime occurs, and we write on Facebook about how horrible it is, and our activism stops there. … It doesn’t do anything, really, but call more attention to the victim. So the overall message of the show is that allies can help … but there are probably better ways to help.”

And although Buckley-Ball knows that some may find the play’s title offensive, she noted, “We do not want people to feel attacked when they enter the building. … We want people to come with an open mind. … We always want the curtain call to be the beginning of the audience’s experience, so they’re talking about the play on the drive home, or doing research on what they saw when they are back in front of their computer. We really hope the show provides food for thought.”

“Well-Intentioned White People” will be shown at the Matrix Theatre located 2730 Bagley Ave. in Detroit. Tickets are $22 adults and $17 for students, seniors, veterans and active military personnel. Reach out for more information by calling 313-967-0599 or visiting matrixtheatre.org.

Brennan Villines ‘Make(s) It Work’ with Brand-New EP

BY EVE KUCHARSKI

After overcoming a battle with drug addiction and an HIV-positive diagnoses, musician Brennan Villines jumped into the national spotlight with a showstopping performance on Fox’s singing competition show “The Four.” Villines imprinted upon viewers not only his musical talent, but the memorable story of his path toward healing. Since his appearance, Villines has been honing his craft even further and has used his national exposure to introduce both new and veteran fans to his unique musical brand. He’s even used the platform to work as an ambassador for Sobercity, a platform dedicated to connecting people who live a sober lifestyle.

Last month, Villines released a brand-new pop-heavy EP called “Make It Work,” and has been amassing hundreds of thousands of streams across a variety of music platforms. Villines caught up with BTL to chat about his path to success, how life obstacles have informed his work and his next career moves.

Then did you think you were always going to be a musician once you realized that?
I did. ... Since I was a child I literally remember singing in the shower, pretending that I was performing. I don’t know exactly what age, but I can tell you I was really young, and I remember pretending I was at Radio City Music Hall or whatever. So, it’s a blessing that early on I figured out what I wanted to do with my life or had some sort of goal in mind, which a lot of people take a long time to figure out and sometimes even change careers halfway through their life. But it was also a curse because the career that I chose was entirely difficult (laughs) to get anywhere.

You did end up majoring in music, too, at the University of Memphis, which I’m sure helped develop those skills.

The thing I will say about what I do is, because I chose piano at such an early age, if I were just a singer or songwriter, I would probably be a barista by day or, you know, a bartender or something. But because I have a piano skill and I’m able to lead a band or play weddings and do all the stuff for the many years that I have been in the music industry, it’s allowed me to be able to have a source of income. Even when I’m not performing at a festival, I can perform at a church or a theater show.

College is also where you had a major turning point in life. You’ve said that you met somebody who ended up knocking your life off course at that time.

I met Charles* and he was beautiful. He would be able to tempt anybody into a relationship with him. Not only was he physically attractive, very much so, but he... was also kind of manipulative. We ended up getting to know each other and one night I was introduced to meth, which is what he liked to do recreationally.

It’s not entirely his fault that I continued to be a meth user; it was a decision, a choice that I made, but it certainly changed the course of my life for a few years. If not, arguably, the course of my life, period. When I used it the first couple of times I was simply trying to fit in with someone who I thought was massively attractive, and I was awestruck. Fast forward about a year and a half into our relationship, I found out that I was HIV-positive. And, of course, me being in a relationship threw up some flags like, “How did this happen?” He knows what he did and it’s in the past.

That’s a mature outlook on what happened. Did it take some distance from the experience to develop that view?

That’s exactly what it took. ... I literally ran away with another guy. I packed up my bags and got a job on a cruise ship and was away at sea for a year being a piano bar entertainer on a cruise ship. I traveled the world and kind of found myself again.

That was an exciting time in my life and I thought things were on the upswing, and then I moved back to Memphis with the intention of moving to New York — this was about six years ago. That didn’t happen and I started using again. I broke up with my boyfriend then.

Fast forward a little further, and I got a “real” job. It was the only “real” job I ever had. I worked as an executive assistant at this event planning company. It was not a good fit at all. I learned that I could never work a day job — I’m not cut out for that kind of work (laughs) — and that I needed to be doing something more creative in my life.

Is that when you decided to get back into music?

A good friend of mine and I sat down one night for a chat, (and I told my parents that I had been fired from my job and that I was going to go back to music. This was about three or four years ago and now I live in New York City.

Do you feel that the fact that you’ve overcome a tumultuous past has influenced your artistry at all?

Absolutely. I think that everything that went down years ago, it kind of helped me find my voice, honestly. From that point on in those dark times in my life, every time I would sit down at the piano the room would go silent. Kind of like when people stop in their tracks sometimes when they hear something they like. I think, all of a sudden I finally made that switch from performer to artist.

I come from such a privileged life. This was a very real setback. It really honed in on an emotional response that I was able channel through my singing voice and some of the things I wanted to say.

Now that you’re in New York, what’s the biggest difference you’re noticing between working in Memphis?

I just started scraping the surface here. I’ve been here for five months. I’m fully prepared for it to take up to a year for me to fully even skim the surface. ... Memphis is very special to me because I was able to live there comfortably and make a living doing what I love to do.

If I had moved right after college to New York City, this is just me speaking personally, I would’ve been probably swallowed alive and not know who I was artistically or mentally and emotionally. I would have probably ended up taking a job in another field.

How has your time on “The Four” impacted your work as an artist?

You know, I’ve auditioned for those kinds of shows over the years, especially when they came to Memphis. “The Four” ended up being the one that worked out. But artistically I was never really excited about being on one of those shows because basically what they wanted to do is have you sing “Superstition” or some popular song that everyone knows, and then you’re boxed into that category that everyone saw you on TV as. One key thing that I learned from “The Four” is that because I was able to maintain some of my artistry on the show, I fully realized my artistic integrity.

Speaking of artistic integrity, what felt right to you about moving to New York? Why did that city pull you toward it more than a place like Los Angeles or Atlanta?

You know, part of that was gut feeling. The main answer about New York is that my producer is here; that I have a longtime friendship with him. His name is Benny Reiner and we went to college together in Memphis and formed a couple of bands together.

Leading up till now, we’ve been working on this record. I’d fly to New York for a few days at a time. I finally made the decision about a year ago to move. New York just felt right for me, because of my personality and with my experience in theater, too.

As an LGBTQ artist, do you find that your identity influences the music that you write?

Of course when I’m writing about something if it has anything to do with a significant other, it’s definitely going to be about a boy (laughs). I would say, yeah. I don’t necessarily write about LGBT issues, or I haven’t yet, but it’s definitely a part of my identity in terms of my presentation of who I am. I’m definitely out about it and about my status, and that’s very important to de-stigmatize (along with) drug addiction. But those are things that I am more on the front end of rather than sexuality.

21 Years Advocating and Out
Transgender Michigan Founder Celebrates Two Milestone Birthdays
BY DREW HOWARD

Rachel Crandall-Crocker has two birthdays: the day she was born and the day she began living her truth. Friday, Nov. 2, commemorates her second. That was the day she committed to living fully as Rachel. Dozens of friends and community members attended a costume party in her honor at Affirmations, which doubled as the 21st anniversary party for Crandall-Crocker’s organization, Transgender Michigan.

Founded in 1997 with the help of her wife Susan Crocker, the organization works to advocate on behalf of the transgender community through events, online resources and a first-of-its-kind helpline that’s reachable at 855-345-TGMI (8464).

Looking over her two decades-long advocacy, Crandall-Crocker said that nothing like Transgender Michigan existed when the organization was formed.

“There was a lot of loneliness. And there were people who were taking their own lives. It was really awful,” she said. “We wanted to create a way that people could all come together so we won’t have to be so lonely anymore.”

Its 17 regional chapters alone can attest to the organization’s fight against loneliness in Michigan’s transgender community, along with seven special interest chapters. Susan Crocker cited Transgender Michigan’s events calendar as another measure of the organization’s growth.

“For our first project we put out a calendar of all the events across the state for three months - it was half a page,” she said. “Now it’s too big to publish.”

Beyond that advocacy, Crandall-Crocker is also the founder of the International Transgender Day of Visibility.

“In March it’s the 10th anniversary,” Crandall-Crocker said. “I created it one late night on Facebook, and now it’s an international trans holiday!”
