Michigan Trans Man Named Teacher of the Year

BY EVE KUCHARSKI

A fter a months-long application process, Oak Park English language arts teacher Owen Bondono was pleasantly surprised to learn that he became Michigan's Region 9 Teacher of the Year in May. But after meeting the other nine candidates in the running for the statewide honor in an online video call, he was convinced that this was “as far as I go.”

“I was completely surprised. In the Zoom call of where they make the announcement of who won I think you can see the roughly 30 seconds of just TV static happening in my brain when they said my name,” he said. “I wasn’t even expecting to win the regional teacher of the year, much less anything beyond that.”

After the fog faded, the reality of the win set in. Bondono realized that much of his role as MTOY would mean not only being an advocate for the over 100,000 teachers across Michigan but the 1.5 million students they educate. Bondono has set his sights on both making students' virtual educational experience during the pandemic an equitable one and on being an advocate for marginalized voices among the state's students. As an openly transgender teacher himself, he said it’s valuable that every student has the opportunity to feel secure at school.

“I think that, in general, as teachers it is our job to make students safe and comfortable in our room so that they can bring whatever version of their authentic self that they’re comfortable bringing,” he said. “Because, beyond the academics, our whole purpose is to grow them into confident, successful people.”

Building Empathy, Fostering Identity

This fall, Bondono will start his sixth year teaching at the Oak Park High School 9th Grade Learning Community. He said that while a teacher of any subject can create a deep and lasting connection with their students in the classroom, he believes that teaching ELA “uniquely situates” him to help students explore not only their own identities but their thoughts on literary themes that are applicable to society as a whole.

“I think school is the first real place where students get to assert their own identity free from things like their own family obligations or how the people in their lives already see them. Every year they get the chance, if they want to, to try and reinvent themselves. And sometimes in high school, students from class to class are trying to reinvent themselves,” he said. “So I think one of my greatest joys as a teacher is getting to see a student play with different identities and decide for themselves who they want to be and sort of settle into a comfortable version of themselves in front of me.”

Bondono said he has two main criteria for choosing student reading material: it has to be a well-written example of the English language and it should be relatable and enjoyable for students to study.

“One of the big purposes of ELA is to read from a lot of different perspectives and take those perspectives in ourselves. And, naturally, that grows our empathy,” Bondono said. “So, I think in discussing the sometimes fictional, sometimes nonfictional lives that we read about, we discover a lot about ourselves.”

And because of his own trans identity, Bondono hopes to reassure students and parents that those who discover they are LGBTQ should not be ashamed.

“[Trans activist and actress] Laverne Cox talks about being a possibility model rather than a role model, and that’s something that I’m hoping I can be for trans students and also other trans teachers or potential teachers: just someone who says, ‘Other people may say that they don’t want queer people teaching their kids, but even though that may be true some places, there are places where you’ll be welcome and you’ll be able to make an impact,’” Bondono said.

A Safe Space for Discussion

But merely choosing thoughtful content for students to digest is not enough for a true sense of safety, and subsequently confidence, in the classroom — particularly for those students who are in marginalized communities like the LGBTQ. Bondono said that much of his success in the classroom relies upon him showing his support for students daily.

“In a physical classroom, one of the first things I try to have up is just representation that shows them physically when they walk in that they are safe. I have a rainbow flag behind my desk, I have some of my classroom decorations purposely include historical figures from all kinds of books of the global majority — including LGBTQ,” Bondono said. “But that’s not something that will necessarily be available to me in an online setting [during COVID-19]. I think the biggest way that you show it — posters and stuff are great — but students have learned, especially LGBTQ students and other students of the global majority, to be wary of those kinds of symbols. Somebody can put up a poster without having done the internal work to truly be an ally.”

Additionally, Bondono says it’s vital that he doesn’t let students get away with any discriminatory discussion while in class — whether they intended their statements to be harmful or not.

“[I] combat not just any casual homophobia or transphobia that comes out of my classroom but also sexism and racism and colorism and classism and so on. And [I] try to not make it about punishing the student who said something wrong, but, instead, when those things do come out in my classrooms ... I will stop and I will pivot our conversation in a way that hopefully doesn’t call out or embarrass the student who said anything. But it instead asks us to examine what attitudes that comment may have come from and what learned roles they may be perpetuating and why we may not want to perpetuate those things.”

Valuable Self-Instruction

When asked how he works to monitor his own biases so that he can effectively regulate classroom discussion, Bondono was frank: he’s unafraid to reach out for help. He works to create online learning-focused communities through social media. There, he connects with fellow educators and can confer about the appropriate way to handle different classroom issues.

“I can’t tell you the number of times I’ve jumped on Twitter to say, ‘Hey, this happened in my classroom today, I knew it wasn’t OK but at the time I didn’t know how to respond,’” he said. “And then I get responses from other people, I absorb their thoughts, and the next day I might start off class by saying, ‘Hey, something happened yesterday in class and I want to talk about it now that I’ve had time to think about it myself.’”

He added that willingness to admit he was wrong is key to building trust among his students, too.

Owen Bondono realized that much of his role as MTOY would mean not only being an advocate for the over 100,000 teachers across Michigan but the 1.5 million students they educate. Bondono has set his sights on both making students’ virtual educational experience during the pandemic an equitable one and on being an advocate for marginalized voices among the state’s students.

“A lot of teachers get this idea that they can’t apologize to students or that they can’t appear weak like they have any gaps in their own knowledge or experience in front of students, but I think the opposite is true,” he said. “They need to see that you’re human and that you can learn from your own mistakes and say, ‘Hey, I should have called that out yesterday, but I didn’t know enough to do it then and now I know better.’”

But as big of a student advocate as Bondono is, there may come an unforeseen element of self-advocacy during his time as MTOY. Specifically, Teachers of the Year from across the U.S. get the opportunity to meet with the president, but in 2019 an LGBTQ educator from Minnesota, Jessica Dueñas, refused to attend the event because of Donald Trump’s anti-LGBTQ legislation. Bondono said that depending on the results of the November election, he might do the same.

“The timeline for my award year is such that I would be meeting the president in 2021, so my hope is that I will not have to make any choices about what to do with the current president,” he said. “However, if it comes down to that, I don’t see myself in good faith being able to shake someone’s hand who has tried to take away my rights.”

While LGBTQ marriage equality was passed by the Supreme Court in 2015, outdated language on Michigan’s lawbooks hasn’t been amended. In fact, many bills still refer to marriage as an act between one man and one woman, like Michigan’s 2004 same-sex marriage ban. But that soon may change, as State House Minority Floor Leader Yousef Rabhi (D-Ann Arbor) has, along with 28 Democratic representatives, sponsored a 54-bill package that would remove discriminatory gendered references across Michigan state law.

“What people often forget is that state laws are also still on the books right now that are contrary to the federal Supreme Court ruling,” Rabhi said. “And while federal law, of course, supersedes state law … it is important to clean the books at the state level and ensure that our state laws are in compliance with federal laws so that if things are to change at the federal level, we would still have our state laws on the books that are protective of everyone’s equal rights.”

In addition to the 54 bills, Democrats have introduced House Joint Resolution T that would put a question on the ballot to repeal the same-sex marriage ban in the state Constitution.

Historically, Michigan’s Republican representatives have not budged when it comes to passing pro-LGBTQ legislation like amending the Elliott-Larsen Civil Rights Act to include statewide legal protections for gender identity and sexual orientation. When asked if he felt the push to update the language on Michigan’s lawbooks hasn’t been accomplished.

“In these last few years, the themes of voting necessity as a form of resistance to increased voter suppression activities, the economic benefits of census participation, and the need to reform the state’s Elliott-Larsen Civil Rights Act to include LGBTQ legal protections in housing, education, employment and public accommodation were seamlessly woven into the fabric of the agency’s four-day event. With less than four months to go until election day, LGBT Detroit intends to increase the beat and insistency of its drum to get LGBTQ+ POC and other often disenfranchised area voters to cast their ballots through mail-in absentee voting measures to protect both residents’ health and vote.

“It’s critical, even in the age of COVID-19, that we allow nothing to impede the democratic process or get in the way of our community’s vote. If that means absentee voting, social distancing and line seating for elders at the polls, or just getting as creative as possible to ensure the Michigan voters’ will is heard and responded to by these candidates, then our partners and we will have done what needed to be done” said Curtis Lipscomb, Executive Director of LGBT Detroit.

Lipscomb added, “In these last few election cycles, I believe Detroiters, and all Michiganders, have learned how crucial the Michigan vote is to make or break what happens politically in this nation. While some may say so goes California, so goes the rest of the nation, I say no, dear, that would be Michigan. So, it’s up to us to know the power we have and act accordingly by showing up or casting our ballots by Election Day as only those in our great state can.”

Michigan Supreme Court Chief Justice Hosts Zoom Town Hall, Urges Community to Flip Ballots Over

BY JASON A. MICHAEL

A virtual town hall meeting hosted by Michigan Supreme Court Chief Justice Bridget Mary McCormack, who is running for reelection, and Supreme Court candidate Elizabeth Welch, took place Wednesday, Aug. 12 via Zoom. The meeting, which was moderated by newly appointed Regional Political Director for the Biden campaign and LGBT Caucus Chair for the Michigan Democratic Party Roland Leggett, also featured Jay Kaplan, staff attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union of Michigan’s LGBT Project.

“We’re still at a stalemate with our current legislature and the party that is in the majority is not willing to move pro-LGBT legislation forward,” Kaplan said. “So, therefore, we have to rely on our executive branch to see things they have the legal ability to do as well as the courts to see what they have the ability to do. So it would be a significant step forward [to have a pro-LGBT majority on the State Supreme Court].”

Michigan State Supreme Court Chief Justice Bridget Mary McCormack agreed. McCormack, who joined the court in 2013 and has been chief justice since the beginning of 2019, lamented the fact that she was short a progressive or two on the court. She also expressed her frustration at the large number of people who don’t even vote for State Supreme Court justices as they appear on the back of the ballot in the nonpartisan section.

“A lot of people who vote for Joe Biden and Kamala Harris will not cast a vote in the nonpartisan section of the ballot,” she said. “So that means they’re not having equal say on who sits on the State Supreme Court and that is a mistake because the Supreme Court makes incredibly important decisions that affects all of our families.”

Welch said much of the same.

“They drop off the ballot, or worse, they guess,” Welch said. “That’s a lot of voters for judges. And we don’t want them to guess, which is why I’m so glad you’re on this call to learn more about us. ... This is a swing seat if you look at who’s nominated. Right now, there are four Republican nominees and three Democrat nominees.”

Welch took time out to explain the significance of the State Supreme Court and its role in state government.

“We know there’s now an expansion of the reading of Title VII to include LGBT protections,” she said, “I do employment law, so this is my world. However, if you’re an employer that’s less than 15 employees you’re not covered by Title VII. You’re covered by Michigan law at that point. And Michigan law is not expanded. So while there is a lot of efforts around that, which Jay can certainly talk more about, if a lawsuit were to be filed in Michigan around this issue it would be decided by the State Supreme Court because that’s a state law.

“The courts could decide ... historically [The] Elliott-Larsen [Civil Rights Act] has been interpreted to kind of mirror Title VII in some cases, but that’s undecided,” Welch continued. “But that’s an issue that could come before the court.”

All three speakers mentioned the issue they believe is going to be the next big step in LGBTQ rights law.

“One of the biggest threats to LGBT equality is the attempts by faith based organizations, by individuals who are citing religious beliefs saying they should be exempt from complying with civil rights laws even where they might be receiving a government contract to provide government services,” Kaplan said. “It has the potential to take us down a very dangerous slippery slope. Because we’re not talking about religious activity. We’re talking about providing a governmental service. So, the courts are going to be playing an incredibly important role.”

McCormack concurred, citing that religious freedom civil rights law conflict is “the next frontier.” Welch agreed.

McCormack and Welch have been campaigning together and McCormack made it clear how much she wanted to see Welch on the court.

“We are really lucky to have Elizabeth Welch willing to stand up and run for that seat,” she said. “She’s been a longtime ally, advocate for every good idea that there is in the state. And, also, is really smart and energetic and knows how to run a campaign.

“I will not be happy on election night if I win and she doesn’t,” McCormack went on. “It’s that simple. Her help is what I need to keep getting stuff done.”
Corktown Health Center Joins With WellPartner to Expand Prescription Access

BY JASON A. MICHAEL

GBQT-focused health care providers Health Emergency Lifeline Programs and Corktown Health Center announced on Wednesday, Aug. 12, a new relationship with Wellpartner, the 340B program administrator of CVS Health, to expand and improve prescription drug access for its patients. The announcement was made by Corktown Health CEO Anthony Williams.

“HELP and Corktown Health Center implemented an integrated care model to help our patients achieve the best health outcomes,” Williams said. “The relationship with CVS Health strengthens that model by helping providers, pharmacists and patients all work together. In addition, the large geographic footprint of CVS locations will be a convenient choice for our patients to get their prescriptions from anywhere in the country.”

The Federal 340B Drug Discount Program plays an important role in ensuring that eligible health care providers that serve vulnerable populations can help qualified uninsured and underinsured patients access affordable outpatient prescription medications. As a 340B covered entity, HELP/CHC is authorized to purchase outpatient prescription drugs at discounted prices and make them available to its patients through select contracted pharmacies.

Wellpartner will deliver end-to-end 340B program administration for Corktown's CVS Health relationship to help optimize its ability to provide important, affordable health care services and prescription medications to patients. In addition, CHC aims to improve continuity of care. Doctors and clinicians will have access to tools to understand prescription adherence for their patients filling at participating pharmacies. This in turn will help them better monitor patient therapy and can help improve overall patient outcomes.

“Across our CVS Health enterprise, we are committed to helping address health disparities in the United States, and we use many aspects of our business to increase access to affordable care and prescriptions for vulnerable populations,” said Kenneth Bodmer, president of Wellpartner and vice president of CVS Health. “Through our integrated and comprehensive 340B program management capabilities, we are able to help covered entities like HELP/Corktown Health.

Corktown Health Center is a health clinic created by and for Southeast Michigan's LGBTQ community and the providers who serve them. The first of its kind in Michigan, the clinic provides a range of primary care services, including integrated HIV care. The center also partners with Wayne State University and others in the medical field to train health professionals in providing LGBTQ care, conduct relevant research and develop best practices.

Gov. Whitmer Recognizes, Addresses Racism as Public Health Crisis, Creates Black Leadership Advisory Council

BY BTL STAFF

Gov. Gretchen took action last week to elevate Black voices in state government, signing Executive Order 2020-163, which creates the Black Leadership Advisory Council. The governor also signed Executive Directive 2020-9, recognizing racism as a public health crisis and taking initial steps to address it within state government. Under the Executive Directive, the governor asked MDHHS to make health equity a major goal, as well as required implicit bias training for all state employees.

David Coulter Declares Aug. 4 Primary Victory for Oakland County Executive

BY BTL STAFF

Oakland County Executive Director David Coulter claimed electoral victory Wednesday morning during the Aug. 4 Michigan primary election.

“I am grateful that voters judged me by my record as county executive and validated the work we are doing to manage the COVID-19 pandemic, recover economically and bring progressive change to Oakland County,” Coulter said.

“I believe my collaborative leadership style – and record of accomplishments with the Board of Commissioners – around our ‘Oakland Together’ vision is what citizens want to see from their public officials,” he continued.

“We certainly have more work to do and I’m looking forward to making our case to voters in November.”

Coulter will face a Republican challenge in three months, but he believes his strategic focus on health care and equity with a strong economic recovery plan will be supported by the majority of voters on election day.

“We are appreciative of the voter support we have received, but starting today, we take the first step toward November. I believe our Democratic slate of candidates will appeal strongly to all voters in Oakland County and I look forward to a strong unified effort,” he said.

Book in Process (No. 2)

My mother took me on Sundays to the First Baptist Church in Detroit from the time I was five until I turned 12. We rode with a Mrs. Williamson and her two sons, William and Robert.

Detroit’s First Baptist, now People’s Community Church, was affiliated with the American Baptist Convention, a liberal group, in contrast to the fire-and-brimstone Southern Baptists.

When I turned 12 — “the age of NT accountability” — I became eligible for church membership through the rite of total-immersion baptism instead of sprinkling. I took this step seriously, even though I looked with some interest at the other boys who, naked, were putting on their white, full-length baptismal robes.

I was also dimly praydar aware that the organist and choir director, Dr. Cyril Baker, had a funny walk and exaggerated mannerisms. But his selection of music was impeccable and contributed at some level to my nascent aesthetic sensibility.

Following my baptism I was given a Holy Bible, in which the Rev. Ernest L. Honts wrote, “To Robert (my middle name), May you always be a good monk.”

To this day I don't know what he meant. Suffice it to say, I’ve spent a small — very small — portion of my long life performing sackcloth and ashes penance for my many sins of commission and omission.

My mother insisted that year I was baptized that I go to Baptist camp. Whether or not the brothers William and Robert went as well I don't recall, but, devout Baptist that I was, I was eager to go.

Quite innocently I thought nothing of taking along several issues of “Strength & Health” magazine, which featured my musclemen idols Clarence Ross and Steve Reeves.

I did everything that one was expected to do at a religious camp. I prayed, read scripture, wrote poetry (“A day at camp is a happy one.”), swam, canoed, played baseball and got brown as the proverbial berry.

I also developed an attachment — actually a crush — on my camp counselor, Jerry Johnson. I was in tears when I had to say goodbye and wrote him several chatty letters. He answered none.

I stopped going to First Baptist shortly thereafter, probably because Mrs. Williamson moved and there was no one to drive us to service. By the time I turned 15 I found a friendly neighborhood church to attend: The Missionary Workers Tabernacle (Interdenominational), which I attended faithfully three times a week.

The curious thing — and today I would say marvelous thing — is that the Tabernacle was run by women who, despite the biblical admonition “suffer not a woman to speak in church,” felt the call to preach the gospel. They played banjos, guitars, trumpets, mandolins, tambourine, preached and sang. They also held services at Detroit’s Campus Martius.

The Tabernacle was founded in 1923 by Anna Curry.
Wachowski also spoke about one character, Switch, who was edited in the original film, initially having a dual gender presentation, noting “The Matrix stuff was all about the desire for transformation, but it was all coming from a closeted point of view.”

“We had the character of Switch, who would be a man in the real world and then a woman in the matrix,” Wachowski added, “and that’s where our head spaces were.”

Of course, none of this seems to be what people outside of the trans community saw. It was a bit of a “Shoot ‘Em Up” good versus evil story about a dystopian world, where you could take a “red pill” to escape and fight back. Honestly, they’re not wrong — it’s just that there is so much more going on.

That people missed the subtext to the story, let alone continue to ignore any of this in the years since the Wachowski sisters came out is, I think, an allegory of its own.

When transgender people come out, even now, we often face a backlash. Family and friends, who may have told us that their love was unconditional, learn that this is simply not the case. Many are cast out from the places they once assumed would always welcome them.

In many cases, too, we are told that we are wrong in our beliefs, and our very identities welcome them.

Lately, too, the widely debunked concept of “rapid onset gender dysphoria” has been making the rounds, a notion that a person only “thinks” they may be trans because they see friends transitioning or see information about transgender people.

The assumption being that they never saw anything about their friend that made them think they were transgender before their friend came out — hence the “rapid” part.

I dealt with the same when I came out. I did a better-than-average job of appearing as a man, and my coming out surprised many — even knowing that I had, intentionally or not, dropped more than a few clues. My parents, for example, were blindsided, even though they found caches of clothing and makeup hidden in my room dating back to my preteen days.

We learn to hide ourselves, out of what is sometimes very justified fear. We often do the best we can to try to be the men and women everyone expects us to be and have reinforced in us since birth. Nevertheless, our trans selves may well have been there all along, telling us that something isn’t right about all this. Until, one day we cannot keep it a secret anymore, and we need to, at last, speak our truth.

Consider this time, at long last, to be the “coming out” of “The Matrix.”

After all the clues, all the moments in the film that may have made it plain, people can now look beyond the more obvious story of murderous machines and heroes who can bend reality and see a deeper meaning.

Let Kansas go “bye-bye,” and see “The Matrix” as it truly is now: a trans allegory.

Gwen Smith used to take a couple red pills a day in the 1990s. You can find her at gwensmith.com.

Perhaps most disturbing was the sad plight of one of the younger Missionary Workers, blonde-braided Sister Anderson, whom I recall one Sunday service being completely distraught and sobbing uncontrollably.

Her brother had died unexpectedly “unsaved” and was now suffering the torments of hell. (Presumably, these 60 years later, he’s still suffering for his unrepentant sins.)

Monday Night Democratic National Convention LGBTQ Overview

BY LISA KEEN

L ong gone are the days when the Democratic National Convention slated only a token openly gay person on its pre-priemtime schedule. Monday night, the first day of the DNC’s four-day 2020 convention, openly LGBTQQ people were everywhere: in the opening video, in conversation with the nominee, leading conversations with health care workers and sharing stories of loss from the novel coronavirus epidemic.

Some of the convention’s LGBTQQ speakers Monday night were well-known: Chicago Mayor Lori Lightfoot and international soccer champion Megan Rapinoe.

Just 30 minutes into the convention broadcast, the Democratic presidential nominee Joe Biden appeared in a staged “conversation” with five people, including Lightfoot. Biden asked Lightfoot how she prioritizes all the things she has to do as mayor to tackle systemic racism. Lightfoot said, “It’s really all about economic empowerment.”

Later in the broadcast, Rapinoe served as a moderator for a conversation with four frontline health care workers, including a male nurse. And then State Delegate Danica Roem, the first transgender person to be elected to office in Virginia, appeared in an opening video.

One of the convention’s Day One speakers was Kristin Urquiza, who drew national media attention in June when she wrote an obituary for her 65-year-old father who died of COVID-19.

“She had faith in Donald Trump, he voted for him and listened to him,” Urquiza said of her father. When Trump and Arizona’s Republican governor told people it was OK to go back to pre-COVID-19 activities, Urquiza said her father believed them. But soon after going to a karaoke bar, her father came down with the virus and, after “five agonizing days,” he died.

“The only preexisting condition” her father had, said Urquiza, “was trusting Donald Trump.”

As Urquiza spoke, the convention saw photos of her and her parents and her partner Christine Keeves, chief of communications for the San Francisco LGBT Center. Urquiza and Keeves started an organization Marked by COVID-19 to promote prevention activities related to the pandemic.

FDA Approves Human Trial for Treatment to Cure HIV

BY LOU CHIBBARO JR.

A merican Gene Technologies, a Rockville, Md.-based gene and cell therapy company, announced on Aug. 11 that it has received approval from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to begin its first human clinical trial for a unique cell altering treatment that it believes will enable the immune system of people who are HIV positive to permanently eliminate HIV from their body.

“AGT developed a new treatment to repair immune system damage done by HIV and allow natural responses to control the virus,” the company says in a statement announcing the approval for its clinical trial. “From its research, AGT believes a cure is attainable and is now taking the significant step of testing in humans.”

The statement says AGT is conducting its Phase 1 clinical trials at sites in the Baltimore-D.C. area. It says the Washington Health Institute in Northeast D.C., Georgetown University, and the University of Maryland’s Institute of Human Virology in Baltimore will be the three sites for the trials.

According to the statement, the Phase 1 trial will investigate the safety and efficacy of a product the company calls AGT 103-T, “a genetically modified cell product made from a person’s own cells.” It says the product and treatment should work to remove HIV infected cells from the body and “decrease or eliminate the need for lifelong antiretroviral treatment.”

In an online virtual news conference held on Aug. 12, AGT Chief Executive Officer Jeff Galvin explained that the clinical trial involves a multi-step process of extracting blood from an HIV-positive person whose HIV is fully under control through anti-retroviral medication and immediately subjecting the blood to a process of Leukapheresis, which separates a type of white blood cells known as T-cells.

Galvin said the T-cell samples extracted through that process will be sent to a lab, where they will be genetically altered in a process developed by AGT. He said AGT believes the genetically altered T-cells will make them resistant to HIV infection and enable them to do what HIV has prevented human T-cells from doing during the course of the 40-year plus HIV epidemic – to neutralize the virus and prevent it from harming the human body.

Once the gene altering process is completed and an initial waiting period is used to allow the altered cells to multiply in the lab, the cells will be “reinfused” into the body of the person participating in the clinical trial.

AGT has said in earlier statements that individuals participating in the clinical trial will initially continue to take their regularly prescribed anti-retroviral medication while testing of their blood continues to determine whether the newly infused T-cells are killing or neutralizing HIV to a degree that will no longer make the anti-HIV medication necessary.

C. David Pauza, AGT’s chief science officer and the company’s lead researcher in the development of the genetically altered T-cells, stated at the news conference that under FDA protocol, the process must be shown to be safe and not have significant side effects on the first person to undergo the procedure before the procedure is performed on the second person to participate in the clinical trial.

Pauza said he, Galvin and the AGT team consider the FDA’s approval of the clinical trial an important development brought about by years of research and laboratory testing.

“This is momentous news that we have FDA approval to launch Phase 1 and conduct our first human trials,” he said in a statement. "We are beyond excited to reach this milestone. This brings us closer to our goal of transforming lives with genetic medicines,” he said.

The State Department has appealed a federal judge’s ruling that said it must recognize the U.S. citizenship of a gay Maryland couple’s daughter who was born in Canada via surrogate.

Lambda Legal, Immigration Equality and Morgan Lewis, a private law firm, represent the Kivitis. The two advocacy groups also represent Derek Mize and Jonathan Gregg, a gay couple from Atlanta who sued the State Department after it refused to recognize the U.S. citizenship of their daughter, Simone Mize-Gregg, who was born in England via surrogate.

The couples maintain their children are U.S. citizens under Section 301(c) of the Immigration and Nationality Act that states “a baby born abroad to married parents is a U.S. citizen at birth when both parents are U.S. citizens and one of them has resided in the United States at any point prior to the baby’s birth.”

“It’s sad that we have to continue this legal battle,” said Roe Kiviti in a press release that Lambda Legal issued on Monday.

“Once again, the State Department is refusing to recognize Roe and Adiel’s rights as a married couple,” added Immigration Equality Executive Director Aaron C. Morris. “The government’s attempts to strip Kessem of citizenship are unconstitutional, discriminatory, and morally reprehensible.”

A State Department spokesperson on Monday declined to comment.

“We decline to comment on pending litigation,” the spokesperson told the Washington Blade in an email.

Judge Blocks Trump Admin from Enforcing Anti-trans Health Care Rule

BY CHRIS JOHNSON

A federal judge issued an order Monday blocking the Trump administration from enforcing a rule allowing health care providers to discriminate against transgender patients — one day before the regulation was set to go into effect.

U.S. District Judge Frederic Block, a Clinton appointee, draws heavily in his decision on the U.S. Supreme Court’s recent landmark decision in Bostock v. Clayton County, which determined anti-LGBTQ discrimination is a form of sex discrimination.

“The Court reiterates the same practical concern it raised at oral argument when the Supreme Court announces a major decision, it seems a sensible thing to pause and reflect on the decision’s impact,” Block writes. “Since HHS has been unwilling to take that path voluntarily, the Court now imposes it.”

The Department of Health & Human Services rule, made final in June, vacated an Obama-era regulation interpreting the ban on sex discrimination in Section 1557 of the Affordable Care Act to apply to cases of anti-trans discrimination.

Block takes a swipe at the Trump administration for vacating the rule both before the Supreme Court had a chance to render a decision in the Bostock case and reusing to change course after it was handed down.

“By its own admission, HHS knew that the case was pending and would have ‘ramifications’; it must also have known that a decision would be handed down before the end of the Supreme Court’s term,” Block writes. “It then had an (admittedly brief) opportunity to re-evaluate its proposed rules after the case was decided contrary to its expectations.”

The lawsuit was filed in June by the Human Rights Campaign and the BakerHostetler law firm in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York on behalf of two transgender women of color — Tanya Asapansa-Johnson Walker and Cecilia Gentil — with long histories of discrimination in health care.

Alphonso David, president of the Human Rights Campaign, said in a statement the order was a win for both for plaintiffs and the court.

“We are pleased the court recognized this irrational rule for what it is: discrimination, plain and simple,” David said. “LGBTQ Americans deserve the health care that they need without fear of mistreatment, harassment, or humiliation.”

The order stands in contrast to a decision from U.S. District Judge Reed O’Conner in 2016 barring the U.S. government from enforcing the Obama-era rule against anti-transgender discrimination in health care.

Now that an order has been handed down barring HHS from enforcing the law as well to prohibit anti-transgender discrimination it wasn’t immediately clear how the department would implement Section 1557 of the Affordable Care Act.

The 2016 order, however, predates the Bostock decision, which Block indicates is the correct guide in reaching the conclusion the Trump administration’s anti-trans exclusion is, in fact, inconsistent with the law and should be reversed.

An HHS spokesperson in response to a Washington Blade inquiry on enforcement deferred the Justice Department, which didn’t respond to a request to comment.

“We are disappointed in the court’s decision and refer you to DOJ for further comment,” the HHS spokesperson said.

HIV Cure

product observed in our labs, this therapy has a high potential to be effective,” Pauza said.

Galvin told the news conference that the current cost for the complete process of extracting cells from an HIV infected person, genetically altering the cells, and reinfusing the HIV resistant T-cells back into the person’s body is about $200,000. But he said he’s optimistic that the cost of the procedure will go down dramatically as it is used more frequently in coming years. Among other things, he said that the extraction of the T-cells and the genetic alternation process can be done through machines in an automated process that can lower costs.

FDA spokesperson Monique Richards told the Washington Blade the FDA is prohibited by law and regulation from commenting on or acknowledging the existence of an investigational new drug application, known as an IND, or whether a clinical trial is taking place.

“The FDA supports the safe clinical development of these products and we are committed to continuing to work collaboratively with industry and the medical and scientific communities to provide the information and guidance needed to help foster the advancement of these promising therapies,” Richards said in an email on Friday.

AGT CEO Jeff Galvin said genetically altered T-cells will make them resistant to HIV infection.

Out ‘SNL’ Alum Paula Pell Puts a Goofy Queer Spin on Jessica Fletcher in ‘Mapleworth Murders’

BY CHRIS AZZOPARDI

Writer-actress Paula Pell knows it’s ridiculous: a dowdy, out-of-touch suburban broad with an accent that is somehow a little British – or Irish, or something – who solves murders in her quaint town. But the Emmy winner, who wrote for “Saturday Night Live” for nearly 20 years and recently made a dildo-assisted splash in front of the camera as Val in the Netflix original movie “Wine Country,” ate up every bit of “Murder, She Kind of Wrote.” So playing a randy, gay Jessica Fletcher? It’s the kind of role she’d kill for.

Luckily, she didn’t have to. Fellow comedian and “30 Rock” actor John Lutz asked Pell if she’d be interested in portraying an amateur sleuth. She said absolutely. And now, for 12 short-form episodes on Quibi, she is. In the hilarious satire "Mapleworth Murders," Pell’s Abigail Mapleworth solves insanely silly murder-mysteries in her own peculiar way, with help from her millennial, selfie-obsessed niece (Hayley Magnus).

Recently, Pell called to talk about the show’s shenanigans as a pandemic salve, why she thinks Angela Lansbury would be into the show, and that time she accidentally sent a dildo to her parents.

I don’t think there could possibly be a better time for this show. I needed to laugh. That makes me so freakin’ happy. I hope that that is true for many people, and I hope that a lot of people watch it, because we loved making it so much. It was one of those moments, and there are so few. “Wine Country” was one of them. But those true things you do and you go, “If I were able to do that as my job, I would do it all the time.”

You know, we weren’t sure what date we were launching because of everything that has happened, and schedules were so screwed up. It was getting so … like, god when is this going to come out? And I really am glad it came out when it did because it does feel like our souls are so exhausted that we just need something to laugh at. Something weird that’s not terrifying.

Are you eager to find out what Angela Lansbury thinks of this show? Because I am. I am eager. At first we were talking about maybe having a tiny cameo or something if she was able to. I mean, in the second season we would love to have something where I’m having trouble with my niece and then I call my aunt and it’s her; we’re all connected.

Because we’re so filthy in it, I was a little bit worried that if we called her and she saw some of it, she’d be like, “Oh, this is disgusting.” But then I remembered, of course, that Angela Lansbury is such a theater broad and she played Mrs. Lovett in “Sweeney Todd,” which is just my dream role. And I’m like, “She can be very dark.” And very sweet. I’ve heard, from everyone I’ve ever talked to that has ever met her, I would be thrilled some time to have her even see it or look at it or know that it’s just an homage, because it’s got so much love behind it for her and for that show.

What was it like to bring Abigail to life?

So much stylistically made me so freakin’ excited because the style is so specific. We wanted her to just be totally eccentric and mix all these different patterns. By the end of it everyone on set was so funny because they’re like, “I’m obsessed with the Mapleworth style, and I really, really wanna dress like Abigail Mapleworth.” The bucket hats, the trench coats, the scarves – it’s such a reminder to me of all those old broads in my family: those great aunts, the grandmas and my mother, who is now in her 80s. She’s hilarious, and she’ll just get her slacks on with her little Chico’s jacket and her scarf and her earrings and her lipstick and then she’ll come home from church and go sit in her bra with her necklace still on and eat potato salad and a hamburger. Ha! Just very strong women who are also dainty are my favorite thing of all. I have always loved matrons. I was born at 50. And like, is there anything better than "The Golden Girls"? I mean, you just want to live with them.

How did you land on that wild affectation for Abigail?
A little bit of it was this actress that I worked with, Anne Meacham, when I was in college. I understudied; we had a pro theater company at University of Tennessee. They would bring in people from Broadway and soap stars. I worked with Melissa Gilbert, and all these people who were on these shows in the '80s. And this woman was Anne Meacham. She was a theatrical actress on Broadway who did a lot of Tennessee Williams plays. She was also on "Another World," the soap opera. And she was just this old theater broad with red-dyed hair pulled back in a tight bun. She was really skinny, and she was blind, and I had to take care of her the whole time because in "The Lion in Winter" she played the queen. And she was so eccentric: "I love you! I hate all of them! But I love you!" She would take my dog and put my dog's face in her makeup mirror and she would put his face in there to make him look at himself in the mirror. She was the ultimate theater broad. And I ate it up! I was just so obsessed with her.

I've often thought of doing a one-woman show where I just was her and did a bunch of adventures that happened during that time. So all these years, I've had that voice in me. So Abigail has a bit of that dainty but sort of "Is she British? No" vibe. You're like, "They're born in Wisconsin but they talk like they're European." So I just love those dainty ladies that have a household of knick-knacks and a lot of dogs. And a "handywomanman."

Speaking of a handywomanman, I had to take a double-take because that's your fiancé Janine Brito as Junie.
Ha! When she kisses me and takes my earring out of her mouth.

Whose idea was that?
That was her idea. She was like, "I think once I'm whispering to you, I should come back and have your earring in my mouth."

Did you do it in one take?
No. We did a bunch of different versions of that, because there were some where she was whispering a lot of things and I was saying, like, "Oh, well, we can do that together. Or separately and watch each other!" But we do want to do more of Junie. We want Junie to be in there always, like, cleaning out my pipes, or down under the floor, under my bed doing something. Just always working.

Your characters in both "Wine Country" and "Mapleworth Murders" are involved in some way with dildos. Which get me thinking: dildos really are as erotic as they are completely silly. Is that why they end up in your projects?
Ha! I spent a lot of time alone! There were times, like after my divorce or before I was ever even married, you do have to have that little drawer. You have to have something in that little drawer.

I have to tell you something funny about a vibrator. I bought a very haphazard vibrator on Amazon – ha! – not too long ago. It was at Christmas that I ordered this vibrator and I was like, "Oh, I'm going to order this very basic one." I ordered it, and then I went home for Christmas and then went back home to LA after Christmas. It was January 15th, and I looked on my phone. It said, "Your package has arrived" and showed the picture of the vibrator and I was like, "Oh, did we get a package?" And I look out at my house in LA and I didn't get a package. Then I looked, and you know how they show you where they delivered it? It was delivered to my mom's front porch, like, with her poinsettias and her little beagle statue that says "Welcome." So next to that is a box with a basic Amazon vibrator in it and it made me laugh so hard. I called my mom and was like, "There's a package there, it's something for me, just send it back to me." Of course they opened it and then repackaged it with Orlando newspapers.

That seems horrifying.
Well, it was really fun to talk to props about different projects about my vibrators and dildos and have them discuss with you, like, "Now, this one, you're gonna have to push this" – like, the prop department is showing you! In "Wine Country" too. It was like, "Now this thing, this button is kind of ... it sticks a little bit. So you gotta turn this here."

Would you be any good at solving a murder?
I've always loved the idea of being a detective, but I would want to be the one that's in the office, or going to the people that aren't scary and dangerous to ask them questions. I would love being part of solving something that helped people have closure or helped find a bad person. Like, I would love doing that. But I also have fear of that sort of repercussion of criminals. When I was young I was always afraid somebody was going to be stalking me for turning them in.

So I would love all the sitting and talking about the human nature of it and trying to interrogate someone and getting them to admit something and be good cop, bad cop. That part really is interesting. But the rest of it would scare me. I wouldn't want to be the one in the danger part of it. I'm a chicken that way.
Michigan Opera Theatre Reconfigures Seating, Gears Up to Host Live Shows

BY EVE KUCHARSKI

As novel coronavirus pandemic restrictions are becoming something of a new normal around the state, venues like Michigan Opera Theatre are having to make do with virtual performances and online outreach to fans. But due to a recent reconfiguration of MOT’s seating arrangements, live performances might soon be a reality. That’s because MOT event organizers purchased a 9,100-square foot deck that can be installed above the theater’s normal seating. Chief Administrative Officer Patricia Walker said that when in place, it will allow attendees to social distance while attending MOT’s shows.

“When we’re operating as a theater with theater seats, there are 2,700 seats in the opera house. So, utilizing traditional theater seating, you can get quite a few people into that theater. Now, it’s a very different style of event when you put up the deck, but if social distancing is still in place, we can still fit probably 250 people on the deck and stage area and ensure the six-foot radius,” Walker said. “When social distancing is not a requirement, we can seat over 500 on the deck.”

The idea for the installation of the deck came about after Levitation Staging, a Grand Rapids-based staging equipment company, shut its doors. The company’s representatives reached out to MOT and offered to sell the deck. Having used Levitation Staging’s services before, Walker said that MOT jumped at the opportunity.

“We would lease it for specific events like “BravoBRAVO!” , the MOT Gala and, on rare occasions, when somebody wanted to [use] the opera house for a wedding and they really needed a large space,” Walker said. “... Thanks to the generosity of a donor from the Michigan Opera Theatre, Floy and Lee Barthel, we purchased the deck. And the decision to put it up and keep it up during the pandemic period is basically because of the need for social distancing.”

In addition to allowing guests to attend shows like normal, Walker said that attendees can expect no interruption in food and beverage services and they will be able to view shows in unique formats — especially if it’s a smaller, more intimate performance.

“It can give us a lot of versatility for how to use the opera house. But it also provides so much versatility for the kind of events we can do and how the event feels,” Walker said. “So, we can now build out that main floor deck and we can create more of a cabaret-style performance within the opera house, so people are sitting at tables and it’s a much smaller, more intimate feel and yet you still have the incredible Detroit Opera House Auditorium around you. And you can use it for a ballroom, for wedding receptions, you can use it for corporate meetings and we certainly are able to do concerts and things like that on the stage as well.”

And regarding acoustics, Technical Director Dan Brinker said that there’s a chance that the deck will improve the theater’s sound.

“It certainly will be a different kind of feel, but it follows very closely the original slope of the stage, it’s not a perfectly flat deck in our typical installation, and so it will mimic and maintain the good acoustics that we have there,” Brinker said. “We expect it to be equally as good and possibly even a slight improvement in the acoustics.”

And because the deck will bring guests closer to the stage, Brinker feels that it’ll be an “interesting experience” for longtime MOT fans. And for those feeling insecure about attending an event in closer proximity than virtually, Walker outlined security precautions that MOT has been taking.

“We will have the ability to host indoor gatherings safely, and when we’re ready to [host performances again] we will have our pandemic plan published on our web page,” she said. “We’ve been working NSF International to create a national public health plan for reopening the opera house to ensure absolute safety. And by putting this deck in place we can offer social distancing in place to host any number of events at the opera house, and we’re looking forward to being able to put those into practice.”

‘Connecting,’ the COVID sitcom coming soon

It was inevitable. First there was the “30 Rock” remote reunion, then one from the late, great cult sitcom “Happy Endings.” This month, the horror movie “Host” – directed remotely and shot entirely via Zoom – premiered on streaming platforms. And here comes “Connecting,” a new sitcom for NBC, about a group of friends trying to stay close through video chats during the current global health crisis. Created by Martin Gero and Brendan Gall (“Blindspot,” “The Lovebirds”), it stars “30 Rock” regular Keith Powell, Ely Henry (“Suburgatory”), Preacher Lawson (“America’s Got Talent”), Jill Knox (“Keith Broke His Leg”), Otmara Marrero (“StartUp”), as well as queer cast members Parvesh Cheena and (“Crazy Ex-Girlfriend”) and Shakina Nayfack (“Difficult People”). They’ve been given an eight-episode order, and if it goes well both on-screen and off, maybe the characters will all get to leave their houses and hang out again. Someday.

Lesbian Cartoon Alert: The return of ‘Harriet The Spy’

Beloved children’s novel “Harriet The Spy,” by lesbian author Louise Fitzhugh, has endured through the decades, almost certainly bolstered by the fandom of young queer kids who found in it a smart, industrious baby butch (who, let’s be real, was also kind of a brat, but in a great way). Harriet ruled her little corner of 1960s Manhattan, trying to learn everything about everyone, spying on and writing about people who caught her attention. Great news, then, that more than 20 years after the live-action feature film version, it’s being adapted for an animated series on Apple TV+, with the title role voiced by Beanie Feldstein – herself a young lesbian and rising star – and co-starring Lacey Chabert and Jane Lynch. More cause for celebration: it’s written by Will McRobb, who created the legendary, and legendarily odd, ’90s kid-sitcom “The Adventures of Pete & Pete.” Parents, bookmark this one and help your precocious kid grow up properly.

Robin Roberts producing Mahalia Jackson biopic

You know her as a host on “Good Morning America,” but Robin Roberts has also broken into the producing game, one of the few queer Black women to do so. She’s responsible for the TV movie “Stolen by My Mother: The Kamiyah Mobley Story,” and will now develop four more films for Lifetime under her Robin Roberts Presents banner. The first to be announced is going to take you to church: “Robin Roberts Presents: The Mahalia Jackson Story,” a biopic of the legendary Grammy-winning gospel singer and civil rights activist. Born in 1911, Jackson’s long and revered gospel career placed her squarely in the center of the Civil Rights Movement, performing for an integrated audience at Carnegie Hall, at John F. Kennedy’s inauguration, and at the 1963 March on Washington. “Orange is the New Black” star Danielle Brooks, herself a Grammy winner and Tony Award nominee for “The Color Purple,” will play Jackson. We’re looking forward to this one, and to some gospel karaoke from the privacy of our couch.

Lifetime setting up a ‘Christmas Set Up’

You always knew it would be Lifetime that would go full-tilt Queer Christmas first. Sure, Hallmark just announced they were taking steps to make their annual slate of holiday movies more inclusive of people who are not white and straight, but everybody who watches this sort of thing is aware that Lifetime is the more daring network. (So what if that daring mostly involves movies about suburban swingers trying to murder each other? It’s the thought that counts.) Which brings us to “The Christmas Set Up,” the first made-for-TV holiday movie to center a gay male relationship. It’s about a lawyer from New York City, returning home to Milwaukee for Christmas with his meddling mother, who’s arranged for her son to “accidentally” run into his old high school crush, now a very successful computer person in Silicon Valley. Just as stockings are about to be stuffed, along comes a job offer in London that threatens to tear up this wholesome homosexual reunion. What will happen at Christmas? You already know the answer, so watch it when it airs just to prove that homophobes don’t hold a patent on enjoying room temperature romance.

Community and mental health support is essential for success. Individualized care plans based on evidence based medicine and created to match each individual’s desires and pace is essential to make the transition process a safe and healthy journey.

5. Sexual Health and HIV Prevention
(Dr. Paul Benson & Mark Rosen) Release: 2/27/2020
We’ll discuss sexually transmitted infections and their prevention. Many healthcare providers sweep this topic under the rug, but outcomes improve when we talk about how to stay healthy and infection free. Sexual health is not simply the absence of disease. It’s living comfortably without fear or stigma; and embracing your sexuality while living day to day in your comfort zone.

6. Living Well Over the Age of 50
(Dr. Benson and Colin Colter) Release: 3/12/2020
We’ll discuss simple steps you, with the assistance of your doctor, can implement to live longer and healthier. Proper health maintenance makes a big difference at any age, but becomes even more important as the decades pass. We’ll talk about prevention and aggressive strategies to manage co-morbidities sometimes encountered as we age. We can’t turn back the clock, but you can improve your heart, liver, brain function, kidneys, and virtually every organ system.
